In a typical office of a conventional building structure, the building load (i.e., the weight of the building itself or of the people and objects in the building and the rate of movement of those people and objects) is supported by the building foundation, the concrete foundation walls, and the earth below the foundation walls. Such a building structure is called a “stressed earth building”. In order to ensure that such a building will not collapse, soil strength is generally not less than about 12.5 megapascals (MPa). However, the stronger the soil is, the more difficult it is for building inhabitants to enter or exit the building. In other words, the building inhabitants cannot enter or leave the building through the entrance or the exit in a normal manner as long as the soil supporting the building is strong enough to retain the building structure. The stronger the soil is, the more difficult it is for building inhabitants to enter or exit the building through the entrance or the exit in a normal manner. To prevent buildings from collapsing under the building load, Japanese Patent Publication No. 2001-501522 discloses building foundations in which the floors of the buildings are supported by vaults constructed by piling the earth around them so as to prevent a possible collapse of the building due to the building load. Japanese Patent Publication No. 2000-308611 discloses foundations that are constructed so as to form a hollow to surround the foundation walls. The annular area between the foundation walls and the earth surrounding the foundation walls is filled with the earth. However, the conventional building foundations have the following problems. First, when building inhabitants enter or leave the building, the builders must dig a narrow tunnel in the ground, and then fill the ground dug up with earth. This makes the work
