in the late 1980s, as software-based audio recording and editing became more affordable, there was an explosion of home studios and audio software development. from the mid-1980s to the mid-1990s, many desktop-based audio programs, such as cubase, the fast-growing cakewalk, and ardour (other versions available), were available that could perform multitrack recording and editing. we also saw a number of professional-grade piece-of-crap full-featured recording and recording programs, including, but not limited to, pro tools, nuendo, and sonic foundry, spring up to cater to a smaller market of producers. these programs were somewhat attractive because they were easy to use (compared to the professional programs), but in general, the existing software was not ready for the professional market, which resulted in a slightly under-whelming user experience. with the release of both the iphone in 2007 and the ipad in 2010, affordable multimedia production (and recording) has boomed. any artist who bought an ipad for the artist in them is now either creating ios applications, producing and recording music on their ipad, or both. a lot of exciting stuff has happened in this new market, and it is definitely a hot-bed of development. today, you can buy any number of ios apps that are designed to create or edit music. so, it would be a little unfair to say that there is a definitive "best" ios app for ipad or iphone recording or editing. as with everything in technology, there are always going to be tradeoffs and compromises. it is possible to create and edit music with the ipad. however, to maximize the power of the device, i recommend using a mac computer, a studio quality audio interface, and blackmagic design recording gear. the following section will guide you through the recording and production process with the software and hardware recommended in this article.

this control surface feature can use the usb dongle to send a mouse like any other mouse by attaching the dongle to the computer and then attaching the control surface to the same usb port. it then operates as a native bluetooth mouse but has the same ctrl and shift key functionality as a regular mouse. the up, down, left, right, and middle buttons control the mouse pointer and clicking the right mouse button goes to a browse window. i did not get that far but it looks nice in the preview window. retrieving files from your hard drive is not as troublesome as it used to be. with retina support, just drag and drop the files and the dongle will make sure that the path will be correctly changed to the retina display. the retina display makes all the difference. now with retina support, you can drag and drop a file into your project and it will open up in the waveform window instantly! if you open up the waveform window and then drag and drop a second file onto the project timeline, the file will automatically open in the waveform as well. if your hands are on the keyboard most of the time, why not extend the efficiency of your work even more by enabling a keyboard shortcut that will quickly bring up the waveform viewer? you can then quickly use your shortcut to navigate between videos or to manage the clips. you can also use the finished project to create onscreen help videos. you can easily select a single region of the video to highlight and get detailed help for that region. switch between various regions with the shortcut. as technology became cheaper, computers became more affordable, and midi/dat (digital audio tape) recorders became powerful enough to record several tracks simultaneously, a new era of affordable multitrack recording, editing, and production tools was beginning to take shape. when we wanted to capture loops, beats, and sound effects, we used wave editors and midi sequencers; when we wanted to record our band, we used audio-to-midi converters and samplers; when we wanted to mix and master a track, we used hardware multitrack recorders. 5ec8ef588b
