Delicate arachnoid cyst, has been described [bib0015]. The most important differential diagnosis of dorsal acoustic polyp is intracanalicular acoustic schwannoma, which is also surrounded by bone formation, on MRI [bib0030]. The pathogenesis of acoustic polyp is unclear. Unlike other intra-canalicular lesions such as facial hemangioma and hemangiopericytoma, acoustic polyp is not associated with an underlying vascular tumor [bib0005], [bib0025], [bib0035]. Malakouti et al. [bib0020] suggested that the cyst wall could cause a similar appearance to the wall of a polyp and create the illusion that it is a polyp. The majority of lesions are localized at the cerebellopontine angle and extension into the internal acoustic meatus has been uncommon [bib0005], [bib0015], [bib0025], [bib0035], [bib0040], [bib0045]. The differential diagnosis of dorsal acoustic polyp is rare, but is dominated by cystic lesions of the cerebellopontine angle. Dorsal acoustic polyps are very rare, and only seven cases have been reported in the English literature [bib0015], [bib0025], [bib0035], [bib0040], [bib0045], [bib0050]. Cases associated with pituitary adenomas have also been reported [bib0040]. For a dorsal acoustic polyp arising from the cerebellopontine angle, the first step in the management is to evaluate the lesion in its anatomical location, and to evaluate the contribution of intracanalicular extension. The anatomical location of the lesion is important to determine the most appropriate surgical approach to minimize the risk of injury to the cranial nerves, especially the facial nerve, which courses in the posterosuperior border of the internal acoustic meatus [bib0055]
